Marshfield DoorSystems is First in Industry to Introduce Environmental Sustainability Department

Marshfield DoorSystems, the leader in the commercial wood door industry, is pleased to announce the creation of the Department of Environmental Sustainability. The purpose of this initiative is to provide the architectural and design community, our customers and prospects with an informed resource to help them navigate and understand the various requirements of building “green.” “Green construction is the leading topic of conversation in our industry. We want to help our customers do the right things when it comes to building green,” said Karl Adrian, V.P. General Manager of Marshfield DoorSystems.

The new department will be led by Steve Farley. As director of Environmental Sustainability, Farley is charged with providing information and education in regards to environmental class doors to meet the industry’s needs quickly and accurately. “Steve is the perfect individual for this assignment. He is a 20 year, industry expert who has devoted the time and effort to become Marshfield’s Environmental expert,” said Adrian. Farley is a member of both the Door & Hardware Institute, and the Construction Specifications Institute where he holds a certification as a Construction Documents Technologist.

Internally, Farley will be charged with helping to define door specifications as required by LEED™ and other environmental initiatives. In addition, Farley will serve as an industry resource for architects, contractors and distributors, Marshfield’s customers and prospects, as well as other manufacturers who use door core products in both the commercial and residential markets.
